DigitalFilm Tree

Ramy Katrib and his team have spent over a decade changing the way Hollywood makes magic.

DigitalFilm Tree has developed and continues to refine the craft of file-based cinema post production, giving movie and TV creators the freedom to use new technologies and workflow processes to image, edit, review and collaborate no matter where they may be.

"For the past twelve years we've been involved with the democratization of filmmaking," said Katrib, founder and CEO of DigitalFilm Tree. "We're the place where technology and art converge, and now anyone can create and edit content from anywhere."

When CEO, Ramy Katrib, and his team needed to upgrade DigitalFilm Tree's network, they turned to Time Warner Cable Business Class (TWCBC), a leading telecommunications provider that had recently completed a $120 million development project in Southern California. That upgrade of more than 360,000 miles of fiber-optic cable doubled the number of businesses TWCBC could serve with its high-speed, fiber-optic infrastructure.

The TWCBC team of sales consultants, engineers and technicians thoroughly assessed DigitalFilm Tree's needs, analyzed its onsite server and storage room, and developed a tailored solution that was both economically feasible and workload sufficient.

TWCBC's Dedicated Internet Access is designed for businesses with more than 20 users and/or using technology requiring high availability and low latency. It delivers a continuously protected link between DigitalFilm Tree's local area network (LAN) and the Internet, and works seamlessly with the same Ethernet protocol used for LAN connectivity. DigitalFilm Tree can leverage its existing technical expertise without burdening IT staff with additional training and equipment.
